The problem isn't alignment, and ADB won't solve the blinding headlight problem: we need regulations on brightness.

Whenever I google around for "why are headlights so goddamn bright now?" every article says "The solution is Adaptive Driving Beam headlights, but the regulations around them are just too onerous so we're stuck with our current headlights!"

Friends, have we considered just making the lights dimmer?

Just make the fucking lights dimmer!

"In Europe they have headlights that can detect oncoming traffic and dim "just" the part of the light that would blind them. It's amazing, but unfortunately regulations in the US make these untenable, which is why we have to blind everyone."

No, you can just make the lights dimmer.

ADB headlights sound cool, hopefully we can get them on cars here. In the meantime JUST REGULATE THE BRIGHTNESS OF THE FUCKING LIGHTS

The sun emits about 36 octillion lumens, or 36 thousand trillion trillion lumens. This is a staggering amount of light, and it's only a little bit brighter than the brightest headlamp.

A small image showing the sun's horizon over the Earth's horizon, illustrating the vastness of the sun's light output.

Apparently snow accumulates in front of the headlights while driving.

hannecat922 Follow

They're already having issues! The head lights are sunken in for some reason. This means there is a shelf to hold snow in front of the lights and block them.

Now, every car has to have the snow cleared off the headlights before you drive, but this is way worse. That shelf collects snow as you drive. People have to pull over and clear the snow off mid-drive because they lose their headlights.

Last year, a subreddit member discovered a loophole allowing for an "infinite brightness zone" inside the U.S. FMVSS 108 regulations. This is the problem, not misalignment or aftermarket lights.

A SUMMARY OF ACTIVIST RESEARCH - This is where we're currently at. Thoughts?

TOO DAMN BRIGHT

A summary of research posted to reddit.com/r/fuckyourheadlights by activist u/hell\_yes\_or\_BS

Part 1: The Hypothesis

"Those blindingly bright headlights can't be legal... right?"

The trend toward blindingly bright headlights on new vehicles has resulted in dangerous driving conditions worldwide.

An anonymous American engineer sought to quantify the pain he was experiencing on the road.

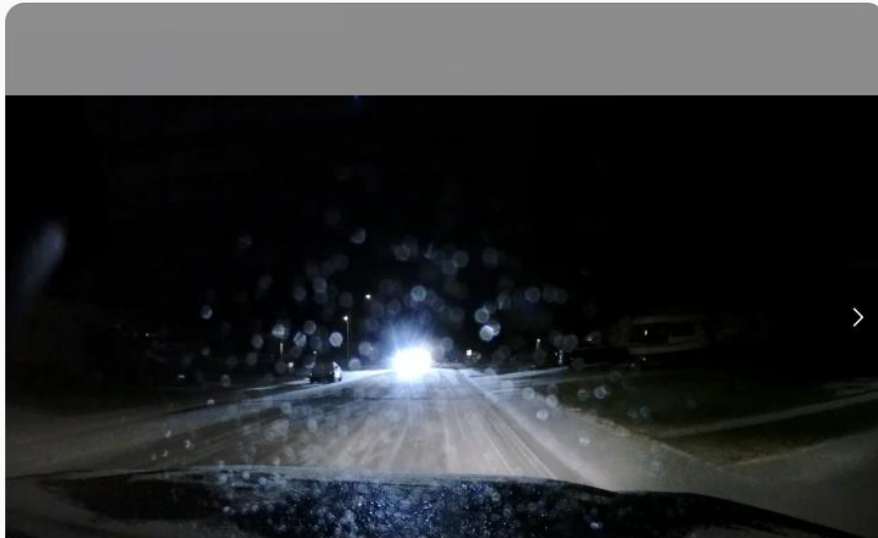

He started by researching the regulations. He began measuring headlight brightness with a self-constructed test fixture.

Convincing members of the public to have their vehicle's headlights tested in a stranger's garage proved to be difficult, but a remedy was found: dealerships.
